PLANTS

Plants are living organisms belonging to the kingdom Plantae. vary, but as the term is used here, plants include familiar organisms such as flowering plants, conifers, ferns, mosses, and green algae, but do not include seaweeds like kelp, nor fungi and bacteria. The group is also called green plants or Viridiplantae in Latin. They obtain most of their energy from sunlight via photosynthesis using chlorophyll contained in chloroplasts, which gives them their green color. Some plants are parasitic and may not produce normal amounts of chlorophyll or photosynthesize.

Effect on indoor air pollution

Indoor plants reduce components of indoor air pollution, particularly volatile organic compounds (VOC) such as benzene, toluene, and xylene. The compounds are removed primarily by soil microorganisms. Plants can also remove CO₂, which is correlated with lower work performance, from indoor areas.

[1] The effect has been investigated by NASA for use in spacecrafts.

[2] Plants also appear spacecrafts.[2] Plants also appear to reduce airborne microbes and increase humidity.

Plant Containers

Plant Containers offer tropical plants an inexpensive solution in designing your distinctive corporate image. Planters create focal points and they can make a statement by dressing up dark building corners or long office hallways. Commercial containers for indoor and out door plants add a decorative element in landscape design, and they come in a variety of planter shapes including cylinder planters, half cylinder planters, square planters, rectangle planters, tier planters and topsider planters. Plantscape also offers indoor plant stands with metal and wrought iron materials, and tall and short plant stands as well as hanging and wall planters. Landscape planters come in every color, from white to bronze to lime colored. Planters are made of several finishes, including ceramic and plastic square planters that shine with a metallic finish.
